

Gabriola bus system—a proposal

Given that the most expensive and complicated part of setting up a bus system is the acquisition and licensing of a bus, and employing someone to operate and maintain it, why not try out a bus system that doesn't use buses?

The idea is to set up bus stops at which people would wait for a ride. Having designated stops would let car drivers willing to give people a ride know where they wanted to go, and save the people needing a ride the inconvenience, and for some, embarrassment, of having to walk along the roadside "begging". It would be, as John Hall and Bruce Mason remarked at a recent meeting at the W.I. Hall, be making the best of what we already have, which is near empty cars travelling the roads with neighbourly Gabriolans at the wheel.
